Category:Software distribution Category:Microsoft WindowsPosts According to the American Diabetes Association, the 20 million Americans currently living with the disease have not had it diagnosed and as of 2016, 90% of the cases are not being diagnosed. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention state that “Diabetes is associated with serious health problems, including heart disease, stroke, blindness, kidney disease, amputations, and nerve damage. Many people with diabetes die from these complications.” The Social Security Administration says that if a person has diabetes and continues to refuse to diagnose themselves, their Social Security benefits could be negatively impacted. This is especially true if a person has not taken any proactive steps to control the disease such as monitoring the level of blood sugar. How does diabetes affect Social Security benefits? Diabetes can affect Social Security benefits in many ways, some of which have been listed below. Increased payments due to any one of the disabilities that are attributed to diabetes, these include: Fully disabling kidney disease Fully disabling blindness Partially disabling blindness Partially disabling arthritis Partially disabling hearing loss Partially disabling visual impairment Partially disabling cerebral palsy Partially disabling nervous or psychological conditions Partially disabling angina Examples of other disability rates In addition to the increase in payments that may be attributed to the disabilities listed above, there are some Social Security payments that do not change. This includes payments for insurance premiums for people who are disabled but are not receiving benefits. Also included is payments for premiums for Supplemental Security Income (SSI) and Medicaid. Changing Social Security benefits for a person with diabetes As mentioned before, if a person with diabetes does not take proactive steps to monitor the condition, they are not only at risk of complications but they could face a decrease in their Social Security benefits. If a person with diabetes is diagnosed, there are ways to counteract this, especially if a person has received a judgment in court or
